Career Options

Completing a Level 2 Certificate in Awareness of Mental Health Problems is a great starting point for gaining basic knowledge about mental health issues. While this level of certification may not qualify you for direct clinical practice, it can open doors to various entry-level positions and provide a foundation for further education and career development. Here are some potential career options:

Mental Health Support Worker: Work as a support worker in a variety of settings, such as residential care facilities, community organisations, or outreach programs. Your role may involve assisting individuals with mental health problems in their daily activities, providing emotional support, and helping them access resources.

Healthcare Assistant: In healthcare settings, you can work as an assistant supporting individuals with mental health issues. This could be in hospitals, clinics, or other medical facilities, collaborating with healthcare professionals to ensure patients' well-being.

Community Outreach Worker: Engage in community-based work, raising awareness about mental health issues and connecting individuals to appropriate resources. This role may involve organizing events, workshops, or support groups to promote mental health awareness.

Peer Support Worker: Use your own experiences with mental health to provide support and understanding to others facing similar challenges. Peer support workers often work in collaboration with mental health professionals and can be valuable additions to mental health teams.

Administrative Roles in Mental Health Organisations: Many mental health organizations and non-profits need administrative support. You could work in roles such as receptionist, administrative assistant, or data entry clerk, gaining exposure to the mental health field while contributing to the organisation's operations.

Care Coordinator Assistant: Support care coordinators or case managers in organising and coordinating services for individuals with mental health problems. This role may involve communication with clients, healthcare providers, and social services.

Social Services Assistant: Assist social workers in providing services to individuals and families dealing with mental health challenges. This could involve helping clients access social services, financial assistance, and other resources.

Education and Training Assistant: Work in organisations that provide mental health education and training programs. Assist in the development and delivery of workshops or courses aimed at raising awareness and reducing stigma surrounding mental health.

Volunteer Coordinator for Mental Health Programs: Coordinate volunteers involved in mental health programs or initiatives. This role may include recruitment, training, and supervision of volunteers working in mental health promotion and support.

Customer Service Roles in Mental Health Hotlines: Work in customer service roles for mental health hotlines or crisis intervention services. Training in communication and crisis intervention skills is crucial for these positions.

While these options provide a starting point, keep in mind that further education, training, and experience may be necessary for career advancement or transitioning into more specialised roles within the mental health field. Additionally, networking, volunteering, and seeking mentorship can be valuable strategies for building a successful career in mental health.
